Previous studies have established a role for the transcription factor Pax6 in dorsal forebrain development. In the ventral telencephalon Pax6 expression is restricted to the subpallium, which is widely considered to be the precursor of the cerebral cortex. Mice lacking Pax6 exhibit a wide range of profound developmental defects. Moreover, Pax6 mutants are frequently afflicted with severe visual abnormalities. Additionally, Pax6 is expressed in the medulloblastoma, which is one of the most common pediatric brain malignancies. A role for Pax6 in medulloblastoma is supported by both genetic and genomic studies that show the homeobox gene is amplified in medulloblastoma. To further our understanding of Pax6's function in the cerebral cortex and to better understand the basis of its phenotypes, the first aim of this proposal is to determine how Pax6 regulates the gene regulatory network that governs ventral telencephalon patterning. These studies will reveal how the differential expression of Pax6 promotes the specification of distinct subpallial cell types. This knowledge will be particularly relevant to our understanding of cerebral cortical development, as molecularly distinct subpallial cell populations give rise to multiple cortical cell types. The second aim of this proposal will address Pax6's role in visual development. These studies will determine how the Pax6-regulated gene regulatory network in the optic vesicle controls the specification and differentiation of the eye. Finally, the third aim will focus on medulloblastoma. This study will determine whether Pax6 functions as an oncogene or tumor suppressor gene in medulloblastoma. Further, we will use a combination of cell culture and genetic studies to determine the role of Pax6's homeobox in medulloblastoma. Together these studies will determine how Pax6 regulates brain development and will reveal how it functions in both normal development and cancer.
